I'm starting to learn Nodejs. I'm currently using OSX, I've looked into the node command (i.e. $ node) and I see the prompt that says: E: ode_projects ode_example> However when I look at the directory structure on my file system the folder node_example doesn't exist, its only node-0.10.28 (which is what I got when I used npm install node) Is there a way to start nodejs on a Linux-like OS, or is that just not possible. A: The nodejs command will compile your code on the fly, as you run it, but it will use a single threaded execution model, so this makes no sense if you wish to run concurrent scripts (while node can do it). However, you can use node with your own version of v8. For example, if you download node from here, you can download v8-2.6.3 for Linux, and add this directory as $NODE_HOME in your ~/.profile. You can run the v8 command by name, for 2d92ce491b
