It is the study of hidden attributes, their interconnections, and their effects on the problem we are trying to solve, be it recovering lost intelligence or developing technologies. I have a personal liking for math and for good math. It has the power to "crack" any problem. Whether it is a math problem or a challenge on a code or an algorithm, math is the master. I am, however, a curious man. I also like to learn from the experiences of others and to apply the lessons of my life to new contexts. Once a guy sent me a text with an equation that solved the problem. I was so impressed, I searched everywhere for the expression. I found it. I was actually happy. It was a cool expression, and I loved that he took the trouble to solve my problem. But the day he gave it to me was a sad day, because it was the last time I would use his gift in that way. I sent him a thank you but also a thank you note explaining I had another solution that I was using. He was really puzzled. He replied, "How can you have it both ways?" I thought about this for a long time, and about how I would like him to understand what I understood. For him, this expression was enough. I, however, needed a lot more to solve his problem. I had an expression, but not enough to really solve it. I also was curious about what would happen if I showed the same equation to my friends. I chose the people I felt had the highest probability of appreciating it, and I sent it to them. One guy was really impressed, and he felt I was good. The other said it was too much work for him. Another said it was just about the same. Another thought it was crap. I was still puzzled. There was a whole class of solutions, and for each one, I could find a problem that it would solve. I could also find a class of problems that it would solve. But this was not enough for me. One of the things that gave me the most satisfaction was to discover how an expression could be used to solve a problem. Once I could find an expression that 2d92ce491b
