A: The Quick Time event which you are trying to get rid of occurs after a certain amount of time has passed. The equivalent in music is called "attack", which means the same thing. The attack time is controlled by the player as a scale sweep will have a longer attack time than a single note played on the piano. This is where you can find the range of values you want. It should be exactly as wide as the range of your piano. If you go up to the keyboard and play a chord, you should see an attack time that is just a bit less than the slowest note in the chord. Play the chord on the piano and you should get the same thing. If you want to have multiple attack times, you can use multiple lines. For example % QT 115 (This creates a new instance of QuickTime). That means one attack time will be applied to 115 milliseconds (1/2 of a second). Then you can do something like % QT 275 % QT 80 which sets the first attack time to 275 and the second one to 80.
