Book rentals and rentals for big overall economy. Werksman claims the arresting officers had no reason to perform a pat-down search of appellant until they had restrained his movements. Werksman also argues the record clearly reflects appellant did not attempt to flee when the officers initiated the pat-down search and appellant's flight was not a motivating factor in the officers' decision to perform a pat-down search. Finally, Werksman argues that the physical characteristics of the area where the pat-down search was performed negates the need for the officers to perform a pat-down search. The State's primary contention on appeal is that a pat-down search was justified under the United States Supreme Court's decision in Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968). Officer Brown testified that during his review of the security tape of the incident he saw
