Ray Garces Body fat patterns as determinants of reproductive performance in industrial women. A number of recent studies have shown that obesity in women is associated with decreased reproductive capacity. To investigate further this association, body fat patterns in women employed in a long-established gold mine were examined in a randomized sample of married miners and in prospectively studied control subjects. Of the women studied, 22% (29/134) of the employed miners were obese, while 6% (6/122) of the control subjects were obese (p less than 0.001). The miners were, on the average, significantly heavier, had lower levels of HDL-cholesterol, and were less physically active than the control subjects. Among the working women, those who were obese were more likely to be older and to have lower levels of plasma estrogen and progesterone than the nonobese women. There were no differences 1cb139a0ed
