1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates generally to a toy and in particular a kite shaped toy which may be used for play by children. 2. Description of the Prior Art Kites have been used for play for many years and various types of kites and games therewith have been provided. It has also been customary to provide lightweight kites to assist children and particularly young children in learning to fly such kites. Such kites have taken many forms including those of simple configuration, rectangular or triangular in shape and those in which the body is partially spherical. These kites are generally single structure, one piece, however, kites are known which are provided with spar members which are attached to the body and flexible to allow the kite to be opened and closed and foldable into a compact, configuration for storage. A representative example of such a kite is shown in U.S. Pat. No. 3,656,930 issued Apr. 18, 1972 to Melroy. In such kite, two elongated spar members are attached to the front of the body and are used to fold the body into a compact configuration for storage. One problem with such a kite is that although the body of the kite is collapsible, the body provides a relatively large area to be covered with a person flying the kite. In addition, the kite is not easily configured for a certain type of play activity.

Glucocorticoid-induced spongy degeneration of the rat lumbar vertebral column. An experimental model of spongy degeneration of the rat lumbar vertebral column induced by intrathecal injection of large doses of glucocorticoid was examined by macroscopic, histopathological and radioactivity techniques. The development of discal hyperplasia was monitored by the appearance of ¹²⁵I-albumin in the nucleus pulposus, by the metabolism of [³H]proline and by the activity of several enzymes of the intervertebral disc tissue. The injection of high doses of triamcinolone acetonide (10 mg) induced the hyperplasia of all the discal structures. The discal cells, responsible for discal synthesis of collagens, appeared undisturbed. The serum levels of glucocorticoid receptors were increased and the metabolism of [3H]proline was decreased in the disc tissue while the metabolisms of three other enzymes remained stable. The results confirmed

Increased risk of tuberculosis in patients with haematological malignancies. Despite decreasing incidence of tuberculosis (TB) in Norway, the incidence of disseminated TB in patients with haematological malignancies is substantial.
