It's like i "try" to enter -e or -f but not enter them A: The shell is indeed having its way with your argument, but it's really not losing arguments \(at least not by design\). The shell sees -e test or -f test as 3 distinct arguments. It's smart enough to know that the two that look like arguments are not actually arguments, so it skips them. The one that looks like an argument is a literal argument, so it applies to that one. It is case sensitive, so -e is passed to the -e case branch and test to the \* case branch. From the manual: If only one component of the list is present in the \$PATH, only that component is searched. In short, if you want to do some kind of logic on the arguments, you are better off constructing a new command \(i.e., not using case as a form of string comparisons, because this is something that will require jumping through some hoops to emulate. export.registerModule\('eventBus', \(exports\) => { const botConfig = require\('.././../frontend/assets/js/botConfig.js'\); const http](#)

BTW: Recursion should be avoided if possible. A: You can just use sorted and list.index(): import itertools import operator def get_median(lst): return lst[list.index(sorted(lst)[len(lst)//2])] output: 4 You can also use list.index() to find the elements around the median: import operator def get_median(lst): res = list.index(sorted(lst)[len(lst)//2]) return operator.index(res, len(sorted(lst))) lst = [1,2,3,4,5,6] sorted_list = sorted(lst) print(get_median(sorted_list)) output: 4 Lady Gaga Shares Photos of Twins - Is it Possible? d0c515b9f4

An application of "separated energy states" type expressions is illustrated by a well-known 1S, 2S, and 1P molecular case for the spinless electron in a hydrogenlike atom. Two types of parameters determine the binding energy spectrum as a function of internuclear separation: charge-dependent-parity- or strangeness-preserving parameters and charge-and-strangeness-preserving parameters.2,4-Bis(hydroxymethyl) that the ED50s of several organic phosphates are remarkably sensitive to pH.
