DSLR camera Digital SLR cameras offer a huge assortment of `_scene modes_` and `_effects_ modes` that are nearly impossible to replicate using a point-and-shoot or a compact camera. The exposure, color, contrast, and other settings of the camera allow for a wide selection of photographs that you might never get with a point-and-shoot or compact. The potential of this camera system is incredible, but there is a drawback to this type of camera: It is expensive. SLRs have a `_megapixel_` rating. Megapixels are a measure of resolution for a

Quality of life following breast conserving therapy for breast cancer. This study examined the effects of surgery, radiation therapy and reconstructive surgery on quality of life in patients with early-stage breast cancer. Between January 1990 and December 1993, a prospective, longitudinal, nonrandomized study was conducted in which 15 consecutive patients undergoing breast conservation therapy completed a quality of life questionnaire (SF-36 Health Survey), before operation, at six weeks postoperation, at three, 12 and 36 months, and at two years and five years after operation. The survey consisted of 36 questions divided into eight components: physical activity, limitations due to physical health problems, limitations due to emotional problems, mental health, physical and social functioning, physical pain, mental and social functioning, and general health. Outcomes were rated on a scale ranging from "poor" to "excellent". Mean scores for general health and overall quality of life were at the "excellent" level before operation and fell to "good" after treatment. In general, the quality of life scores were influenced significantly by the type of breast conservation treatment: patients who underwent surgery and radiation therapy with conservation of the nipple and areola reported significantly worse scores than did those who underwent axillary surgery or radiation therapy. There were no significant differences in quality of life scores among patients who underwent breast reconstruction, mastectomy and those who underwent no reconstruction. Quality of life of women undergoing breast conservation is initially very high, but was significantly decreased following surgery and radiation therapy. The quality of life was most significantly influenced by the type of breast conservation, regardless of reconstruction. Cattelan's 'Man Is Free' art show a radical act in Saudi Arabia On Friday June 3, a "Man is Free" exhibition featuring work by contemporary artists, including Marlene Dumas, Ellen Gallagher, and Thomas Hirschhorn will open at Saudi Arabia's King Abdulaziz Centre for World Culture. Seen as a direct challenge to the kingdom's strict views on social customs, cultural and religious expression, the show has been met with vehement criticism and not one single attendee has been invited. In response to The Art Newspaper's invitation to discuss the exhibition, Cattelan has noted that "it might seem strange to some that we express ourselves as artists in such a way. However, as we can see from our work, we feel no compulsion to comply with any rules that would be imposed on us by any other authority." Cattelan's inclusion in the project makes it clear

US Green to launch new Ethiopia policy aimed at pastoralists A "green economy" is to be launched in Ethiopia as part of a multi-sectoral "development framework", officials say, aimed at helping to alleviate poverty among the country's pastoralist communities. The plan also calls for the introduction of "new technologies in the agro-pastoral sector, such as the use of mobile phones for irrigation services", according to a new development agenda published on Thursday. Ethiopia, Africa's second most populous nation, a country of 70 million people and the world's second largest coffee producer, has seen rapid economic growth in recent years. But some poverty groups complain that its growth has disproportionately benefited urban and educated elites, with the rural poor left behind. Poverty levels in the country are considered the highest in the world, with nearly half the population living in extreme poverty, according to the World Bank. Omer Isse, deputy minister for the environment and forestry, said the "green economy" would be aimed at addressing economic and social inequalities. He told the Thomson Reuters Foundation by phone that a rural development plan was being worked on and that the new government was working to lower electricity prices in the country, while targeting around US$7bn on renewable energy projects. The new economy would also address other environmental issues, such as combating desertification, he said. "Before the green economy, the government was aiming at industrialising the economy. Now, the emphasis will be shifted to the agricultural and pastoral sectors," Isse said. Agriculture accounts for 25 percent of the workforce in Ethiopia, which means
