there is an easy way to stop the echo and even reduce it. most often, this is used with a pa system, but you can do it with any system, even a simple stereo system or a mix. to stop the echo, open up the mixer and right-click on the main audio driver. a menu should appear that has a device manager option. our engineers have been testing new sound cards, remotes and additional hardware to create the most affordable and reliable remote soundcard for a computer. we have used this testing method for our computer. lets connect the zoom with bluetooth. to do this, connect one of zoom's remotes to the laptops bluetooth adapter. click start, type bluetooth then click the icon for searching bluetooth devices. now you will find the zoom remote. on zoom's menu, highlight pair. then if it says no bluetooth, or if its paired with unknown device, give zoom a minute to scan. once zoom has connected and scanned for the bluetooth connection, a new window named boom will appear on your screen. click the boom icon, then click bluetooth. now select your devices from the list on the left. then select the zoom remote. boom and the zoom remote will be connected now. if you want to share your microphone, you need to configure your bluetooth settings. to do this on windows 10, click on the windows button, type bluetooth, and then click it. now click system settings. on the left hand side, click on devices. finally, click on add a device. once the zoom and bluetooth is connected, open the zoom program. go to the setup tab and scroll down to the bluetooth settings. select bluetooth, then click on the pair button. you will be asked for the code. after giving your team the zoom password, the zoom mic is now ready to be connected to a laptop computer.

to get a better idea of what's causing the echo, try to find out which direction the microphone is picking up. using the mic cord, try pointing the mic in other directions or as far away from a blaring radio as you can. if you can listen to the audio through a pair of headphones, you can use them to pinpoint the location of the echo. this will also tell you if your mic is picking up your own audio. finally, if your first port didn't work, you'll have to resort to using the audio enhancer. if the echo is still there, try plugging the headphone jack into the computer's line-in to see if the echo is still present when you let go of the mic. if you enjoy recording your voice and create short audio files, audacity is a great tool to help you to create more professional sounding recordings. audacity will allow you to record your voice while playing sound or other audiovisual files in your library. you can create a custom equalizer to adjust the sound waves of your voice and microphone. audio feedback is a problem that all voice-recording devices face; just like your pc, your phone or recorder also has a built-in microphone with the capacity to record other sound. audacity is a free audio-editing program you use to record and manipulate sound files. you can use it to add and remove effects and also play with how a sound file will be broadcast and recorded. an echo can do a lot to your audio recordings, sometimes drastically altering the sound quality. to prevent you from saying things that end up sounding different when you record it, you should use your software's recording features. if you want to use a program like audacity, you'll need to know which setting to change. it's easy: click on the recording tab and then, as you're recording, click the options button. you'll notice the line in option.
